For India, it is important to create our own narratives of our struggles, understand the nature of the problems associated with governance, and seek to address them on our own.

This seminar will delve and discuss the following aspects from an Indian perspective:

- the need for understanding vigilance, corruption, and transparency in governance
- the need for re-assessing what corruption or lack of transparency is
- research methods on vigilance, corruption, and transparency in governance
- case studies on vigilance, corruption, and transparency in governance

The seminar will also discuss the role of Sardar Patel, the Iron Man of India.

Introduction

India became the largest democracy in the world after its independence from British rule in 1947. Democracy can be defined as a system of governance ‘of the people, for the people, by the people’ which derives legitimacy through transparency and a system of checks and balances. A lack of transparency at any level of governance can pose to be the biggest threat to any democracy.

In this context, vigilance and awareness are the two most distinctive characteristics of any democracy to work efficiently. These two factors create a perfect check and balance mechanism which ensures that any local governance works in the interest of local people. The realization of the same had happened long back in 1964, when Central Vigilance Commission (CVC) was established in India to maintain transparency in the work flow at all levels of governance. Since then, CVC has been working as an apex anti-corruption body in the country.

Context

Transparency International (TI) defines corruption as “the abuse of entrusted power for private gain or specific group interest”. It is pertinent to note that while international organisations like TI have done important work, it can be argued that even though they have defined corruption correctly, yet such organisations hardly ever get the response to address the ground realities correctly, thus making the malaise even worse.

Let us take the case of India and its feedback in relevant international reports on transparency.

As of 2020, India stands at the 86th position on the corruption perception index among a list of 180 countries. which is worse than 2019 when India stood at the 80th position (Transparency International).

According to the Transparency International Report 2020, India has the highest bribery rate in Asia and the most number of people who use personal connections to access public services. It was found that nearly 50 per cent of those who paid bribes were asked to do so, while 32 per cent of those who used personal connections said they would not receive the service otherwise (The Global Corruption Barometer \(GCB\) – Asia).

The Report also stated that bribery in public services continues to harm the basic democratic rights of common Indian citizens. Slow and complicated bureaucratic processes, unnecessary red tape, and unclear regulatory frameworks force citizens to seek out alternate solutions to access basic services through networks of familiarity and petty corruption.

All this could have been very ominous for India, if we could consider these reports as completely credible. A charge can be levelled that TI has failed to incorporate systemic abuses in the developed world which have more far-reaching and devastating effects; take the financial crisis of 2008 as an example which TI reports did not incorporate. Because of such failures it seems that reports like these are just tools in seeking leverage in international geo-politics, or sometimes simply seek to malign other countries.

For India, it is important to create our own narratives of our struggles, understand the nature of the problems associated with governance, and seek to address them on our own. Over reliance on foreign etic narratives is not only unfortunate but also extremely dangerous. In this context the Objectives of the seminar may be summarised as follows:

1. Create awareness among the stakeholders on vigilance, corruption, and transparency in governance in India
2. Understand corruption in India from both the bird's eye view and worm's eye point of view; or, to frame this differently, have both emic as well as etic perspectives on vigilance, corruption, and transparency in governance
3. What could be the best research methods to study corruption or other socio-economic issues from the points of view of ontology and epistemology
4. Stakeholder consultation to contemplate vigilance, corruption, and transparency in governance in India to rewire us with more nuanced yet accurate perspectives

The seminar will also highlight the steps and processes/ mechanisms that need to be followed as per CVC rules and regulations to combat corruption effectively at the level of a single individual or institution or organizational.
